2 shared nothing in common

The facts speak loudly and clearly for themselves: 1. President Donald Trump, who never retracted his campaign claim that Sen. John McCain was not a hero, rejected a plan after his death for a White House statement honoring McCain. 2. McCain banned Trump from attending his funeral, just as former First Lady Barbara Bush did. 3. Prior to his passing, McCain asked former Presidents Barack Obama and George W. Bush to deliver eulogies at his funeral. 4. Leaders from around the world praised McCain, showing more respect for him than for America’s commander in chief. 5. In his official statement about McCain's passing, Trump posted only a photo of himself, refusing to celebrate the senator's courageous record of service to the nation. 6. Monday morning, in a truly ungraceful and despicable gesture, the White House flag, unlike the Capitol's, was no longer flown at half-staff and was not returned to half-staff until the president received widespread criticism. 7. Trump refused to respond to repeated requests by reporters on Monday for him to say something about McCain, only grudgingly issuing a proclamation following a scolding by the American Legion.

Perhaps we shouldn't even use the names McCain and Trump in the same sentence since they share nothing in common.
