How Bolton’s Book Exposes Republicans

June 23, 2020

If any Republican members of Congress continue to support the President in light of the crimes revealed by John Bolton in his new book, it will document that they don't care about the rule of law, ethical principles and the Constitution—and are unfit and unworthy of serving the country.

What is especially troubling is that some of these Republicans no doubt knew before and after the Impeachment hearings and trial about Trump asking China’s Xi to help him win re-election, approving Xis’ intent to build concentration camps, as well as other illegalities and obstructions of justice.

Moreover, members of the Senate surely knew that Bolton’s testimony would directly connect the President withholding U.S. security aid to Ukraine with an investigation into his presumptive 2020 opponent -- the key allegation in the Democrats' impeachment case. In short, with the possible exception of Mitt Romney, Republican senators violated their oath “to defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic.”

It is disgraceful that Bolton and others in Trump's Administration (and there are many) refused to stand up when they were aware of what was happening. The serious crises the country now faces might not exist had they done their job. These officials are and were complicit-- and therefore must be called accomplices. Shame on those Americans who still plan to vote for Trump in November; that proves they believe in a dictatorship, not a democracy.

There is only one cure for the Constitutional crisis threatening our democracy: Vote out as many Republicans in Congress as possible who are up for re-election. The current Republican Party that Trump hijacked must be dismantled and start anew, grounded in more noble ideals. Enough is enough.

Rick Cherwitz,
Austin, TX